Skigard Hytte

Kvitfjell
Norway

Skigard Hytte, Casper and Lexie Mork-Ulnes's Norwegian mountain retreat, near Lillehammer, takes its name from the distinctive spruce batons that clad the exterior of the cabin. Fixed diagonally, these slim wooden staves are usually seen forming farmstead fences in this rural part of Norway, and this is one of many references to regional traditions and architecture woven into the design of this characterful, modern family escape.

"It is really site specific," says Norwegian architect Casper Mork-Ulnes. "We looked at just having one big open cabin but it didn't feel intimate enough. So, the idea was to make four cabins in a row. In traditional Norwegian farm architecture, you might have one timber cabin to begin with and then as the family grows, you add on another so you end up with these long farmhouses. These are the vernacular references we were thinking of with the plan."[138]

The Oslo-based architect and his American-born wife, Lexie Mork-Ulnes, share a love of skiing and the mountains. They wanted to create a bespoke cabin for themselves and their two children and settled upon the picturesque ski resort of Kvitfjell, where they found a suitable hilltop site looking out over the valley below. The couple, who are co-principals at Mork-Ulnes Architects, slotted the new building among the trees, gently elevating it just above the snowline.

Steps lead up to an integrated veranda with an open-sided porch; a guest annexe sits to one side and the entrance to the elongated farmhouse to the other. Inside, a hallway running past the children's bedrooms leads into a spacious great room—an open-plan living space hosting the lounge, dining area, and kitchen. Banks of glass frame the views, and local pine has been used for the floors, walls, and the funnel-shaped ceiling topped by a skylight. The funnel ceilings reappear in other parts of the house, including the primary suite. This reference to the central chimneys seen in traditional Norwegian cabins is one of the ways in which the Skigard Hytte forms a carefully conceived bridge between past and present.
